'A desperate situation for blueberry producers in Georgia' Crop forecast to sustain significant losses for second year in a row

By Amy Carter
amy.carter@agr.georgia.gov

Georgia's fledgling blueberry industry is at a crossroads. Back-to-back years of weather-related losses have growers pondering the sustainability of their industry.

"We've never seen a season like we're undergoing right now. We've been trying for a generation to build a blueberry industry in Georgia, and we're seeing as tough a two years as anyone can remember," said Georgia Agriculture Commissioner Gary W. Black. "We have some folks that have some good fruit, but then our Extension estimates are pointing us toward another significant loss this year."

Black hosted a conference call May 15 that allowed growers and University of Georgia Extension agents to discuss the state of the industry with Bill Northey, the USDA's Under Secretary of Agriculture for Farm and Foreign Agricultural Services. Northey heard from growers that crop insurance is little consolation in a multi-year disaster and that foreign competition is diluting the market for domestic products.

The group asked that blueberries be considered for inclusion in federal disaster-aid legislation and Farm Bill discussions going forward.

Renée Allen, area blueberry agent for the University of Georgia based in Bacon County Extension Office, said conservative estimates put the loss for highbush blueberries and rabbiteye varieties at 60 percent each. Major producing counties of Ware, Bacon, Pierce and Jeff Davis are reporting 25 to 70 percent crop losses. Minor producing counties of Treutlen, Screven and Emanuel are reporting crop losses of 25 to 80 percent.

In a memo to U.S. Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue, the Georgia Blueberry Growers Association blamed weather for widespread losses in 2017 and 2018.

A warm winter in late 2016 and early 2017 prompted blueberry bushes to bloom two weeks earlier than average. When a hard freeze struck in mid-March 2017, the crop was devastated.

The loss was particularly stinging because experts See BLUEBERRIES, page 6

Harvest time in the onion fields

A mechanical harvester lifts Vidalia® Onions from a field at M & T Farms in Lyons. If weather conditions are favorable, the onions will be left on the ground to dry for several days before they are collected for finishing and packing. Although Vidalia onions are grown exclusively in a 20-county region in Georgia, they represent about 40 percent of the sweet onion market in the U.S. and are sold in every state. According to the Center for Agribusiness and Economic Development at the University of Georgia, the state's 2017 Vidalia crop was worth $120 million.

Gov. Deal signs law establishing Center for Rural Prosperity and Innovation at ABAC

By Kendall McWilliams
kendall.mcwilliams@agr.georgia.gov

TIFTON – Gov. Nathan Deal signed House Bill 951 into law May 2. The bill establishes a Center for Rural Prosperity and Innovation, which will be housed on campus at Abraham Baldwin Agricultural College.

According to the General Assembly, the state of Georgia has seen flourishing economic activity and tremendous job growth since 2010. Despite being named the best state in the nation for business by Site Selection Magazine for the past five years, the state's economic successes are not proportionally reflected in rural communities. Rural populations are dwindling in part due to the lack of sufficient health care, poor infrastructure, lack of quality education, lack of employment opportunities and the downward spiral of economic growth.

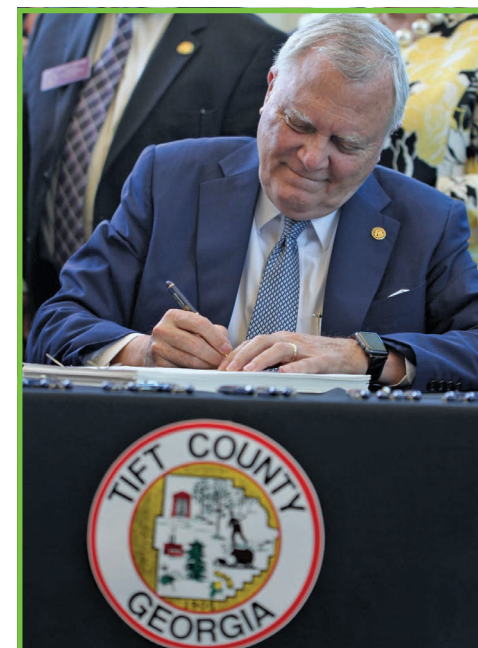

In concert with the University System of Georgia, the Center for Rural Prosperity and Innovation will serve as a central information and research hub for rural leadership training and best practices. According to a press release issued by the House Rural Development Council, best practices may include community planning models, industry-specific assistance and cooperative efforts with nonprofits, religious organizations and other higher education partners.

The House Rural Development Council aimed to address the woes of rural Georgia by proposing several bills during the 2018 legislative session. HB 951 was among the bills proposed. The objective of this legislation was to provide a center that will exclusively study the issues that rural communities face and identify policies to enhance economic opportunity across the state, especially in rural and underserved areas.

"Rural Georgia faces distinct economic challenges, and with this legislation, we could continue to study these issues," said Rep. Jason Shaw, R-Lakeland. "The Center for Rural Prosperity and Innovation would provide a central location for research and information on rural development, which is crucial to enhancing economic opportunities in these regions."

HB 951 also provides for the creation of See HB-951, page 6

MERCER MEDICAL MOMENT: 'Woman's intuition' may be sole early-warning sign of ovarian cancer

Morgan Smith

By Morgan Smith and Jaehwa Choi

In 2015, more than 2.7 million deaths occurred in the U.S. While the most common cause of death was heart disease, the second most common cause was cancer. Cancers can present with a wide variety of signs and symptoms. In some cases, as a tumor grows, it causes pain by compressing nearby bones, nerves and other organs. In other cases, such as ovarian cancer, the tumor may cause no symptoms until it has spread to other sites in the body.

This ability of ovarian cancer to spread without being detected greatly affects the number of deaths it causes. In fact, there is a 90 percent survival rate five years after diagnosis in patients with Stage I disease, meaning the cancer is confined to the ovary itself.

However, in Stage IV cancers that have spread to other organs, like the liver or lungs, the survival rate at five years is only 17 percent. Unfortunately, since ovarian cancer is unlikely to cause many early symptoms, it is more commonly diagnosed at later stages. This delay in diagnosis makes ovarian cancer the most lethal cancer of the female reproductive system despite its rare occurrence.

In addition to a lack of symptoms, the vague and delocalized symptoms that may be due to ovarian cancer can also delay diagnosis. Common complaints caused by ovarian cancer include stomach and pelvic pain, increasing stomach size, bloating, a feeling of fullness and difficulty eating. These signs warrant additional investigation. However, because of the cross-over with gut symptoms, it is not uncommon for patients to be sent to a gastrointestinal physician before their eventual diagnosis. After diagnosis, patients often point to these vague symptoms as warning signs, stating that they "felt something was not right" but often attributed their symptoms to general aging.

Even though early diagnosis of ovarian cancer greatly enhances the cancer-free survival rate, in 2017 the United States Preventive Services Task Force renewed its 2010 recommendation against screening for ovarian cancer in women without symptoms, family history or genetic risk factors.

The current mainstay of screening for ovarian cancer is a blood test and an ultrasound taken with an instrument inserted into the vagina. Unfortunately, these tests are not very specific for ovarian cancer, and so some women without cancer may undergo a major surgical procedure due to a false positive test. For this reason, the USPSTF stands by its recommendation against screening women without an increased risk of developing ovarian cancer.

In addition to the family history and genetic risk factors, increased age, obesity and hormone replacement therapy are all known to increase the risk of developing ovarian cancer. Patients with endometriosis also have an increased risk of developing a specific subtype of ovarian cancer.

More controversial risk factors include a high-fat diet, exposure to talc, and smoking. Though there are many things that increase the risk of cancer, there are a few that may decrease that risk. Taking the hormone medroxyprogesterone (Depo-Provera), removal of the fallopian tubes, tying the fallopian tubes closed, breastfeeding, and taking oral contraceptive pills all decrease the risk of ovarian cancer, though oral contraceptive pill use may increase the risk of breast cancer.

Additional factors under investigation for their role in ovarian cancer risk include having multiple children, beginning menstrual cycles later in life, taking non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs, and undergoing early menopause.

For women with factors that increase their risk of ovarian cancer, it is of utmost importance that they listen to their bodies, especially if they feel that something is wrong. Being proactive in consulting a physician may help women distinguish between the possible vague symptoms of ovarian cancer and those of the normal aging process. A feeling that something is just not right may be the earliest or only warning sign of a silent disease like ovarian cancer.

COOK GEORGIA GROWN: Georgia Peach Upside Down Cake

Ingredients:

6 Tbsps. butter	1 cup sugar
1 cup packed brown sugar	1 cup self-rising flour
½ cup coarsely broken pecans	1 Tbsp. pecan oil
2 cups sliced Georgia peaches	¼ tsp. vanilla extract
3 eggs, separated	2 Tbsps. cream or milk

Preparation:

Preheat oven 325 degrees. Melt butter in 9-inch cast iron skillet, then sprinkle brown sugar evenly over butter. Distribute pecans over brown sugar in skillet then arrange peach slices decoratively, covering the bottom of skillet.

Beat egg yolks until light and lemon colored. Gradually add sugar, cream or milk, extract and pecan oil.

Whisk dry ingredients together then incorporate into yolk mixture.

In a separate bowl, whisk egg whites until firm peaks. Gently fold egg whites into batter until fully incorporated. Scoop batter into skillet then bake 40-50 minutes or until center is set.

Allow to cool 30 minutes then unmold onto a plate. Serve with ice cream or whipped cream.

BLUEBERRIES: Cold, blustery weather hampered pollination say Georgia was on track to produce a record harvest of 120 million pounds. The farm gate value of that harvest would have approached $400 million, according to Scott NeSmith, Ph.D., UGA blueberry breeder.

That would have beat the 2014 record for the state, which pushed Michigan from the top spot nationally by producing 95 million pounds of blueberries worth $300 million to Georgia.

The actual 2017 harvest came in at 30 million pounds.

Weather once again took a toll on what was expected to be a bumper crop of blueberries this year. The last two weeks of February were exceptionally warm, and the plants responded with rapid growth. Bushes were in full bloom when the temperature plummeted below freezing the first two weeks of March. Cold, cloudy and windy conditions prevented honeybees from flying, which caused poor pollination and resulted in small berries and subsequent fruit drop.

"We now believe the 2018 Georgia blueberry crop could be equally as bad, if not worse, than the 2017 crop," the growers association wrote to Perdue.

The blueberry industry has been a boon to small, rural communities, particularly throughout South Georgia.

Nearly 500 growers throughout the region have dedicated about 26,000 acres to blueberries. Roughly half that acreage has been cultivated in the past decade; 15 to 25 percent of it was established in the past five years.

Russ Goodman, who grows more than 500 acres of blueberries at Cogdell Berry Farm near Homerville, said it costs about $15,000 to establish one acre of blueberries. It takes about three years for young blueberry bushes to produce marketable fruit.

Entire communities depend on the investments farmers make in blueberries. Growers pay property taxes on their farms, purchase goods and services to support their operations, and pay labor to plant, tend and harvest their crops.

Goodman estimated that 35 percent of loans written by the local bank in Homerville are written to blueberry growers, and speculated that the numbers are similar for banks in other major blueberry-growing regions.

"When we're in the blueberry business down here, we're in the blueberry business for good," Goodman said. "We're very interested in making this industry work long-term because, to be honest with you, this industry has been a great boost to our economy down here in South Georgia."

HB-951: Rural Council will guide the center

the Georgia Rural Development Council, which will foster conversation and policy development centered around the challenges faced by rural Georgia communities.

In addition to an appointed center director, the Georgia Rural Development Council will have 12 members who will offer guidance to the Center for Rural Prosperity and Innovation. Half of those members will be appointed by the Governor, with each of those six representing interest in one of the following areas: leadership management, business development and entrepreneurship, finance and taxes, logistics of rural industries, health care and education. The Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate will each appoint three council members from different geographic regions of the state.

This council will meet quarterly to discuss and interact with local government officials and community leaders and gather information that can help facilitate policy initiatives that will spur economic growth.

"On behalf of all Georgians who live in rural Georgia or who grew up in rural Georgia, I want to thank Governor Deal and the legislators who turned this idea into reality," said David Bridges, president of ABAC and a lifelong resident of rural Georgia. "Rural communities face many challenges, hurdles and obstacles as they attempt to revitalize and strengthen their situations."

Georgie's Drive Thru Vidalia

Hello! I'm Georgie, the Georgia Grown mascot. I travel the state of Georgia promoting our No. 1 industry, agriculture! Did you know Georgia is the No. 1 producer of Vidalia® Onions? In fact, Georgia is the only state where Vidalia Onions can be grown. I saw my friend Yunion, the Vidalia Onion mascot, at Bleckley County's Pre-K Farm Day. Yunion told me that Vidalia Onions are the Georgia state vegetable. They are the sweetest onions in the world because the soil in Southeast Georgia is naturally low in sulfur. Each year, Georgia farmers grow about 12,000 acres of Vidalia sweet onions. Select, approved onion seeds are sprouted and then transplanted by hand from September through Christmas. They grow during the fall and winter when the days are short. The onions should then be ready to pick from April through June. The production area for this sweetest of sweet onions is a 20-county area centered around the city of Vidalia. Vidalia has onions painted on the walls of its banks, city limit signs, and even the water tanks. But the one you can't miss has got to be the stainless-steel onion fountain at City Park, home of the Vidalia Sweet Onion Festival.

Time is running out to complete the 2017 Ag Census NASS conducting phone and in-person follow-up

ATHENS – The U.S. Department of Agriculture's National Agricultural Statistics Service is reminding Georgia farmers and ranchers that the window is closing on the opportunity to participate in the 2017 Census of Agriculture.

"NASS is grateful for the response from producers to date, but it is important that others who received a Census questionnaire join their neighbors, colleagues, friends, and family in being part of the Census count," said NASS Southern Regional Director Jim Ewing.

"If you produced and sold $1,000 or more of agricultural product in 2017, or normally would have produced and sold that much, we need to hear from you," said Ewing. "If you're a landowner who leases your land to a producer, we need to hear from you. If you received a census but do not fit this definition of a farm, please write your status on the form and send it back."

The NASS has already begun to follow up with producers who have not yet completed the questionnaire.

"We sent the questionnaire to many potential farmers and ranchers who may not be familiar with it," Ewing said.

The Census of Agriculture is the only comprehensive source of Georgia county-level data. Georgia agriculture has changed since 2012 and this is the opportunity to quantify that change.

Georgia producers can respond to the 2017 Census of Agriculture online at www.agcounts.usda.gov or by mail. The same law, Title 7 USC 2204(g) Public Law 105-113, that requires response also requires NASS to keep all information confidential, to use the data only for statistical purposes, and to only publish in aggregate form to prevent disclosing the identity of any individual producer or farm operation. NASS will release Census results in February 2019.

For more information about the 2017 Census of Agriculture or for assistance with the questionnaire, visit www.agcensus.usd.gov or call toll-free (888) 424-7828.

GUEST GARDENER: Consider succession planting for an extended harvest

By Alicia Holloway

Green beans are, hands down, my favorite garden vegetable. I could eat them every day of the week and never grow weary of them. Sautéed, boiled, roasted or pickled, I am ready. Canning green beans, however, is not my favorite task.

Every year, I can and freeze produce, but I have learned through experience that I just don't enjoy canning green beans. Harvest time always seems to fall when it's just not practical to spend hours in the kitchen preserving produce. So, instead of planting beds of green beans and having an unmanageable overabundance, I do succession plantings so that I have smaller harvests for a longer period of time.

"Succession planting" simply means you plant vegetables continuously throughout the season. It can also refer to planting the same crop, such as my green beans, at intervals throughout the planting season.

Planting this way ensures that, as older plants mature and end their production cycle, new ones start to produce. This practice extends the harvest window and ensures the availability of produce at the peak of production throughout the growing season.

Farmers regularly use this practice, but it can be a useful tool for home gardeners, too. It is especially useful if you prioritize eating fresh vegetables rather than preserving them.

For spring and fall gardens, most greens and root vegetables are good candidates for succession planting. For summer gardens, green beans, squash, zucchini, cucumber and corn are appropriate.

You can also use succession planting with annual flowers, such as sunflowers, to make sure you have beautiful blooms from spring to fall. Two weeks throughout the planting season makes for a good planting interval for most crops. For vegetables like green beans that can be planted in the spring and fall, this is a double win and can add weeks to your production times.

Another way to achieve a staggered harvest is to plant varieties with different maturing times. There are numerous varieties available for each vegetable. Many vegetables have early-producing varieties in addition to the old standbys. By planting several varieties that mature over different time spans, you can enjoy the subtle difference in flavor between varieties and have a longer season. Just check seed packets or seed catalogs for average days to maturity to select varieties that will work for you.

Succession planting also refers to planting a sequence of different plants within the growing season. For example, if you plant lettuce for early spring, follow it with sweet potatoes in the same space after the lettuce is finished. Once the sweet potatoes are harvested, plant spinach. You will plant three crops where most gardeners plant one.

Wise use of available space is essential, especially in small gardens. Planning your garden will help you take advantage of available space at planting and throughout the growing season and will ensure your garden stays bountiful from spring to summer to fall. Who doesn't get a thrill from making a color-coded vegetable planting chart and map for each season?

As we enter into the planting season, keep succession planting in mind as a technique to keep your kitchen stocked with your garden favorites.

If you have questions about succession planting or vegetable gardening, visit the University of Georgia Cooperative Extension publication website at www.extension.uga.edu/publications.

Australian seeds could produce new Georgia cultivars of raspberries, peaches

By Sharon Dowdy

University of Georgia horticulturists Rachel Itle and Dario Chavez recently spent a busy two weeks in Australia collecting seeds from wild raspberries and peaches to bring back to the UGA Griffin campus.

As scientists in the College of Agricultural and Environmental Sciences (CAES), Itle and Chavez research Georgia-grown fruit. Itle works with blueberries and Chavez focuses on peaches. They will use this collection of seeds from Australia to breed new varieties of raspberries and peaches specifically for Georgia and the Southeast U.S.

They traveled to Queensland, Australia, in South Wales on international travel grants provided by the CAES Office of Global Programs.

Itle collected wild raspberry seeds. She had to “calibrate” her eyes in her search for the tiny, red berries, which made finding them easier, but the wild berries were not plentiful.

“It was late spring, early summer in Australia when we traveled, so the raspberries were ripe. Some were bright red, some dull red and some golden,” she said. “The fruit size was about a half or a fourth the size of the commercial berries we have in the U.S. I wanted to eat some, but I couldn’t justify it because we drove for miles and only collected a few berries at each location.”

Itle was able to collect about 100 seeds from each berry and a few hundred from each wild specimen, collecting 16 Rubus specimens in total. She hopes to cross the plants that grow from these berries with common raspberry varieties grown in the U.S. to create varieties that can be grown by Georgia farmers.

“We don’t really have a commercial raspberry that is suitable for Georgia. They get too many diseases, and they are especially susceptible to viruses,” she said. “The first step will be to grow the seeds, screen the plant material for pathogens and see what survives. If it can be grown here with the disease pressures we have, we can breed that disease resistance into commercial varieties.”

When collecting wild raspberry seeds in Australia, University of Georgia scientist Rachel Itle first had to “calibrate” her eyes to search for the tiny, red berries. The fruit is about a half or a fourth the size of commercial berries sold in the U.S., she said.

Chavez was on a similar mission to collect seeds from wild peaches.

“These peaches were brought to Australia by the Chinese when they were there building the railroads. They brought peaches from China and threw down the pits, which became trees,” he said. “(The trees) colonized along small rivers and creeks.”

These peach trees produce small, white-fleshed fruit with “a good fragrance and aroma,” he said.

He collected fruit, removed the seeds and brought them home to the U.S. He also collected budwood, or fruiting branches that contain buds meant for grafting onto the rootstock of another plant, that he later used in Australia with his collaborator, Australian researcher Bruce Topp of the Queensland Alliance for Agriculture and Food Innovation. Chavez used the budwood he collected to graft trees that will grow in Topp’s program and be used to obtain more seeds, which will be used in future crosses to create new, hybrid varieties.

“We could bring the seeds back to the U.S., but we were not allowed to bring plant material,” said Chavez, who returned to UGA-Griffin with 80 seeds that are now sprouting in his greenhouse.

The UGA research team worked together to collect specimens and planned each day in Australia to make the most of their time. Planning was made easier by a map of Australia’s living plant species, which included GPS coordinates. To take advantage of the early Australian sunrise, their days began at 5:30 a.m. and ended around 10 p.m.

“We were able to cover a giant chunk of a region in one day until the sun went down at around 6 p.m. Then we had to keep driving until we got close to the next collection site, where he looked for a hotel. Each night we planned our next day, mapping coordinates for the various species. It was a very exhausting trip, but it was so much fun too,” Itle said. “We had to hike to many of the spots. Sometimes we hiked to a spot and never found any plant material; others were right by the highways.”

Fruit tree breeder Jose Chaparro of the University of Florida accompanied Itle and Chavez. He collected seeds from wild relatives of peaches and citrus fruits. The researchers also toured the macadamia nut-, strawberry- and apple-breeding programs at the University of Queensland Maroochy Research Facility.

The collection trip was a major first step in the UGA scientists’ breeding efforts, but consumers won’t be enjoying the literal fruits of their labor anytime soon.

“The varieties we breed are for potential markets in the future, but that will take 10 to 15 years,” Chavez said. “All perennial fruit crops take that long to breed, but we can speed it up a bit by using molecular tools, if possible.”

Fort Valley students investigate ‘royal empress’ of China for Georgia planting Fast-growing tree could supplement farm income

By Latasha Ford

A native of China, the “royal empress” tree called paulownia could rule America’s economy as a multipurpose crop. Research suggests that this fast-growing tree may help farmers establish sustainable income.

Fort Valley State University graduate students Richa Bajaj and Lubana Shahin, who are both pursuing Masters of Science in Biotechnology, are exploring two possible options.

Bajaj is studying the cloning of proven elite trees from the field and genetic transformation of paulownia, while Shahin investigates flowers and leaves for tea properties. They are conducting this research on FVSU’s 5-acre research plot containing approximately 2,600 paulownia trees.

Delving into the cloning process, Bajaj’s research focuses on in vitro regeneration of paulownia elongata elite trees using various tissues and growing media. Her findings could aid farmers and growers in procuring desirable plants/species for ornamental or afforestation purposes. She noted there is no documentation of this type of research on paulownia.

Holding a tray of individual glassware each containing numerous green plants in transparent soil (agar-based nutrient gel), Bajaj explained how she initially took one section from a paulownia plant.

“Each shoot can now regenerate into a plant,” Bajaj said.

She is trying various combinations of plant growth regulators. Before transferring the shoots to the campus greenhouse, Bajaj stored the plants in a controlled environment for about two to three weeks. Expanding her research, Bajaj is also planting artificial seeds of paulownia elongata. She is storing the cultures (beads) at different times up to 20 weeks at 4 degrees Celsius and then will transfer them to a modified gel medium at 25 degrees Celsius to monitor how they regenerate.

“Synthetic seeds are stored for in vitro preservation at 4 degrees Celsius and then tested for their vitality and regeneration,” Bajaj noted.

Fort Valley State University biotechnology graduate students Richa Bajaj, left, and Lubana Shahin are investigating in-vitro cloning of elite paulownia trees and the possibility of making herbal tea from the leaves.

Because paulownia is a fast-growing tree, Bajaj said the major benefit of her research is forestation. Farmers could procure more trees in a shorter period. Therefore, this opens the door for multiple uses, such as timber, biodegradable products, honey production and biochar, which improves the quality of the soil.

Bajaj said the most exciting part about her research is that she formulated one treatment that can work for many stages of paulownia tissue cultures.

“I’m looking forward to the outcome, the regeneration potential and the viability in the greenhouse and in field conditions,” Bajaj said.

An expert in paulownia research, Dr. Nirmal Joshee, an FVSU professor of plant science, said the advantage of Bajaj’s research is that she is optimizing paulownia elongata regeneration from many tissues.

“She has modified the culture media in such a way that from one small tissue, you can have 50 to 100 plants on average. In one bottle, you have a small forest,” Joshee said. “Because they are cloned plants, all of them are identical to the mother plant, high quality and free of any pathogens.”

More interested in the delectable aspect of the versatile plant, Shahin is investigating the use of flowers and leaves of paulownia fortunei and paulownia elongata as tea. Her research could provide another avenue for farmers to market the crop. She said people in China use different parts of paulownia, such as the flowers, bark, fruits and leaves, to make tea.

“There are particular genes that are responsible for the quality of tea. I’m trying to validate scientifically if paulownia has the same qualities,” said Shahin, adding that the fragrant flowers of paulownia would be a good addition as a new herbal tea for tea drinkers.

First, Shahin is researching the properties of the paulownia fortunei flower using different temperatures.

Standing next to a cart with several foil pans and paper napkins containing something that resembles potato chips, Shahin explained that drying the flowers is one of the processing steps to determine the best way to make tea.

Drying the flowers at room temperature in different stages, she will then analyze the tissues for chemical markers and antioxidant capacity and determine which drying method is best to retain important chemicals that impart flavor and medicinal properties.

“The taste of tea comes from the chemicals present in it. All of these chemicals behave in a different manner at different temperatures,” Shahin said.
